For 72 Help Us Help You!

Preparing for potential emergencies starts at the individual level. And, while your State, County and City will be responding to basic community needs in the aftermath of an emergency, available resources and when those resources will become available will vary depending on the severity of the emergency. The first 72 hours after an emergency is the most critical period. Basic infrastructure, communications and transportation systems may be challenged, inoperable or inaccessible and the steady flow of supplies such as gas, ice, water, medicine and food may not be readily available.

Therefore, the first line of preparedness for any emergency is to plan to meet your, your family's or your organization's basic survival needs for 72 hours. By removing or reducing the uncertainty of where your basic needs' supplies will come from during this critical 72 hour period, you will alleviate much of the stress individuals suffer in the aftermath of an emergency and allow for the City to more quickly return to normal operations.

So remember...for 72, Help Us Help You!
